Loitering

The group discussed whether a loitering item was necessary. Based on the lack of reported issues from the police chief and the existence of current disturbing-the-peace provisions, the group generally agreed that no additional action appeared necessary at this time.

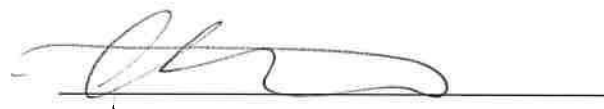

No-Knock List and Solicitation

The committee discussed whether to establish a no-knock list or use no-solicitation signs as an alternative. Concerns were raised that a no-knock list could require additional administrative maintenance and may not meaningfully improve enforcement. Members noted that many solicitors do not obtain permits already, and enforcement would still depend on residents reporting violations and police being able to respond while solicitors remain in the area. Some members questioned whether providing signs would be appropriate, noting that residents could purchase their own signs. The group also discussed whether a permitting or certification model could generate revenue, but that option did not appear viable based on prior feedback from the law director.
